The program is an Adobe Air-based software tool that helps you listen to a wide variety of online radio stations. The application offers you the possibility to browse through the entire collection of radio channels directly from its interface. AirFM Review: No, it's not an app for your air conditioner, at least not at first. In fact, AirFM starts with a fairly straightforward interface for Internet radio. You choose an online service, such as Pandora or Spotify, and then AirFM will give you a list of radio stations from that service, sorted by artist. It's not fancy, but it gets the job done. AirFM is far more than a simple Web radio player. You can browse the entire music collection of hundreds of stations, and you can search, sort, and play all of those stations. AirFM can add to this a number of categories and playlists so that you can, say, play only the songs from a particular artist, or listen to certain genres. And because AirFM was built to run within Adobe Air — which can be downloaded from Adobe's website — you can also customize the interface and playlists. All of this is made possible by AirFM's Real Stream Player, which allows AirFM to play any song on any of the hundreds of stations with a handful of clicks. If you've already got iTunes, you'll feel right at home in AirFM's pop-up windows, but you can also create custom stations and playlists to suit your tastes, and there's even the option to create a list of your own favorite stations that you can use while AirFM is running. AirFM will only play your favorite stations when it is running, but it will also give you the option of creating a queue for any station. You can simply add songs and skip them by hitting the arrow buttons, or you can save your favorites for later. AirFM allows you to add that folder to your Windows 7, 8, or 10 Quick Launch bar, so that you can launch it as a player directly from the Windows start menu. AirFM is free, and because it was built using Adobe Air, it can be run on virtually any computer that has the program. It also has a built-in search tool that allows you to find and play any songs in your collection in a matter of seconds. There's nothing like AirFM. AirFM Pros:
