Strucad is based on the standard AEC.If going underground is your idea of a cold-weather retreat, you might be interested in Tunnels of Terror, a proposed series of under-construction galleries and interconnected caves filled with junk. The story goes that European money and technology expert and former radio personality Prof. Christophe Degallier built the collection of materials, which is currently lying abandoned in his experimental gallery of condensed matter in the German city of Freiberg. Thanks to a recent find, Degallier is now attempting to raise funds to build a properly functioning tourist attraction. The project is called Castles Deep, and if you like a little ghoulish inspiration for a visit, feel free to check out the pitch video below. Remarkably, this is not the first time Degallier’s idea has made headlines. First, there was his plan for a 150-meter-long “underground labyrinth” that would feature much of the junk lying around his laboratories in Germany. And now there is this one. “My project: ‘Castles Deep’, a series of completely underground cave galleries of fused stonework, which between itself and the existing caves have continued to extend. The galleries are interconnected by tunnels, descending in numerous gradients. They are hollowed out of huge chunks of hard rock. 100 meters in circumference, 50 meters in depth, many galleries have long straight segments which can be navigated only by means of mechanized transport. The crossing of a gallery is only possible by ladder,” said Degallier in
